Factors determining polyploidization and other variations in seedling genotypes of Pinus radiata (D. Don) at the University of British Columbia. Variation in seedling morphology and frequency of polyploidy were investigated in a population of 48 Pinus radiata D. Don and a progeny population of 6,421 seedlings from seedlings produced in year 2. Frequency of large diameter dwarf palms (1-3 cm) was correlated with the frequency of large size brachypodia (3-5 cm), with the frequency of lorica formation being the best predictor of tree size. Seedlings producing terminal buds and lost from infestations by Dendroctonus ponderosae (Olivier) present an unusual opportunity to study the genetic control of branching. In one case, restoration of normal branching was achieved after self-pollination of the seedling was induced by pruning the terminal shoots and exposing the terminal bud (1-4 cm). In another, growth of side shoots from the terminal bud was initiated and completed within 2-3 weeks at temperatures of 20 degrees -25 degrees C. The number of times a seedling has initiated side shoots is inherited as a single dominant gene and no correlation was detected between side shoot initiation and ploidy level. With a diallel cross analysis of spore ploidy levels, 17% of the variation was shown to be genetic. The embryo sac and pollen genotypes of seedlings from selfing of the progeny population were investigated. About 50% of the progeny had embryos with normal cytoplasm and about 10% of the progeny had supernumerary sperm nuclei and 52% of the progeny had supernumerary nuclei in the micropyle or abaxial sperm nuclei, indicating the occurrence of a triploidy. Only one progeny had a phenotype consistent with tetraploidy. The results are compared to earlier studies of seedlings with extra cytop bc9d6d6daa
