The brain is highly protected from injury caused by ischemia and trauma. It is well-known that there are two types of damage, one consisting of necrosis and the other consisting of apoptosis, that give rise to distinct pathophysiological and morphological outcomes. The biochemical and genetic similarities between necroptosis and apoptosis have led to the suggestion that necroptosis might be a form of programmed cell death in neurons. The aim of this review is to provide a detailed description of the features of necroptosis and apoptosis, examine their relationship and discuss the significance of the loss of neurons and synapses in the pathogenesis of neurodegeneration and neuropsychiatric diseases. We will also point out the novel insights into the mechanisms of neuronal death by some recent studies that have identified new signaling pathways that regulate apoptosis.The role of MUC2 as a gastric defense factor. Since the late 1980s, it has been known that mucus production in the glandular stomach is essential to protect the host from bacterial infections. However, little is known about the reasons why the glandular stomach secretes mucus. In order to clarify the functions of mucus production, mucin proteins have been characterized. Many of these proteins have been found to act as a barrier against the adhesion of bacteria, and thus seem to play an important role in gastric defense. MUC2 is well known as a major secretory muc
